Jim Furnish is currently a consulting forester in the Washington D.C. area following a 34-year career with USDA Forest Service. He last served as deputy chief for national forests; 9 percent of all lands in the US. He also served as Siuslaw National Forest supervisor in Corvallis, OR during the spotted owl crisis, reforming management from timber production to restoration principles. Jim was also a principle Forest Service leader in creating protections for 60 million acres of roadless areas in 2001. He has served on the board of directors for several conservation and faith-based organizations. His memoir "Toward a Natural Forest" (Oregon State University Press; 2015) speaks to forest management that works in concert with nature.
