The county has already worked with the BLM to identify a site adjacent to preexisting and proposed electric, fiber optic, and natural gas transmission lines. Review of the proposed site by the BLM has not revealed any endangered species or historic resources in the area, and much of the proposed site already has a significant amount of surface disturbance.²

La Paz County is 27% Latino, 18% Native American, and currently has an unemployment rate nearly 2% higher than the national average.³ Not only would this land conveyance help provide renewable energy to both the Southern California and Phoenix markets, but it would help bring a new, family-wage jobs to the county.
